The Inspector General's report and the Department of Justice's investigation into the FBI's handling of the Hillary Clinton email probe were two of the most significant and controversial investigations in recent American history. The investigations examined the FBI's decision not to prosecute Clinton for mishandling classified information on a private email server, and the subsequent fallout from that decision.

The Inspector General's report was released in December 2019, and it found that the FBI had made numerous errors in its handling of the Clinton email probe. The report also found that there was no evidence that the FBI had been politically motivated in its decision not to prosecute Clinton.

The Department of Justice's investigation was led by Special Counsel John Durham. Durham's investigation is still ongoing, but it has already resulted in the indictment of several former FBI officials.

The Inspector General's report and the Department of Justice's investigation have been the subject of intense scrutiny and debate. In this article, we will provide a comprehensive overview of the investigations, their key findings, and their implications.

The Inspector General's Report

The Inspector General's report was released on December 9, 2019. The report was the result of a two-year investigation into the FBI's handling of the Clinton email probe.

The report found that the FBI had made numerous errors in its handling of the investigation. For example, the report found that the FBI had failed to properly coordinate its investigation with the Department of Justice. The report also found that the FBI had failed to adequately document its decisions and actions.

However, the report did not find that the FBI had been politically motivated in its decision not to prosecute Clinton. The report found that the FBI had made its decision based on the evidence available to it at the time.

The Inspector General's report was a significant development in the Clinton email probe. The report provided the public with a detailed account of the FBI's handling of the investigation. The report also helped to restore some of the public's trust in the FBI.

The Department of Justice's Investigation

The Department of Justice's investigation into the FBI's handling of the Clinton email probe is still ongoing. The investigation is being led by Special Counsel John Durham.

Durham's investigation has already resulted in the indictment of several former FBI officials. For example, Durham has indicted former FBI Deputy Director Andrew McCabe and former FBI lawyer Lisa Page.

Durham's investigation is expected to continue for several more months. It is possible that the investigation will lead to additional indictments.

The Department of Justice's investigation is a significant development in the Clinton email probe. The investigation is helping to shed light on the FBI's handling of the investigation. The investigation is also helping to restore the public's trust in the FBI.
