

How Partisan Media Polarize America: Chicago Studies in American Politics

In recent years, American politics has become increasingly polarized, with the two major political parties, Democrats and Republicans, becoming more ideologically distinct and less willing to compromise. This polarization has been evident in the rise of partisan media outlets, which cater to specific political ideologies and often present information in a biased manner.

The Chicago Studies in American Politics is a nonpartisan research center that has been studying the role of partisan media in American politics for over two decades. Their research has found that partisan media can have a significant impact on public opinion, and that it can contribute to political polarization.

The History and Evolution of Partisan Media

Partisan media has existed in the United States for centuries, but it has become increasingly prominent in recent decades. The rise of cable news in the 1980s and 1990s led to the creation of a number of new partisan outlets, such as Fox News and MSNBC. These outlets have become increasingly popular, and they now have a significant impact on public opinion.

The growth of partisan media has been driven by a number of factors, including the decline of traditional media outlets and the rise of social media. Traditional media outlets, such as newspapers and television networks, have seen their audiences decline in recent years, while social media platforms, such as Facebook and Twitter, have become increasingly popular. This has led to a fragmentation of the media landscape, with people increasingly getting their news from partisan outlets that reinforce their existing beliefs.

The Impact of Partisan Media on Public Opinion

Research from the Chicago Studies in American Politics has found that partisan media can have a significant impact on public opinion. One study found that people who watch Fox News are more likely to believe that climate change is a hoax, while people who watch MSNBC are more likely to believe that climate change is a serious threat. Another study found that people who get their news from partisan outlets are more likely to have negative views of the other political party.

Partisan media can also contribute to political polarization by creating echo chambers, where people are only exposed to information that confirms their existing beliefs. This can lead to a lack of understanding and empathy for the other side, and it can make it difficult to find common ground.

The Potential Consequences for American Democracy

The polarization of American politics is a serious threat to American democracy. It makes it difficult to find common ground and compromise on important issues, and it can lead to gridlock and inaction. Partisan media is a major contributing factor to polarization, and it is essential to address its impact if we want to restore civility and bipartisanship to American politics.
